in the dance have not been properly taught. There is an immense amount of velocity in ballroom dancing. Each class has its own way of doing it. A low-bred young man will put one hand spread out between the shoulders of his 'girl', and she will clutch him round the neck. Last year one style was much in vogue; the man would work his arm round his partner so that one hand would be between her shoulders, while the other hand rested on her waist. The couple, almost facing each other, held their hands together to the height of the man's shoulder, and the man stalked about the room pushing the young lady backwards as he went. Another ridiculous fashion, which has not died out, is for the pair to extend their arms fully, and with great rigidity, so that any one who comes into contact with this pump-handle arrangement gets a black eye.

"Well, then, what is the correct way to hold a partner?"

"The lady should be at a fair distance from the gentleman. In the 'best form' there is no embracing. You lightly place one hand upon the lady's waist, and her left hand rests upon your shoulder, whilst you support her with your right hand. The lady places her right hand upon your left, but you must not hold it."

"Is not there a great deal of affection in dancing?"

"It is not work to see where grace begins and affection ends. Every movement should be natural. An Englishman is not possessed of natural movement such as you will find in the Frenchman. Ladies dance much easier, and they learn quicker than the average man. Perhaps it is because of their greater knowledge of music and better ear for time. Besides, dancing is almost the only athletic exercise permitted to them."

"Is it not said that five hours of constant turning is calculated to make anyone bilious?"

"I think it is the lobster mayonnaise which is more responsible for that. I have never been able to see where the enjoyment can be in a quick waltz after a rich supper," laughed the Professor. "But," he added, "the reverse was introduced to obviate giddiness, and to overcome the tendency to one-sidedness. In a very crowded room the reversing operation tends to obstruct. Perhaps for that reason, and perhaps partly because the middle class have taken to it so kindly, the 'upper ten' are discontinuing it."

"What is the new waltz we are so constantly hearing about, Professor?"

"The old waltz was a very quick waltz. The modern one has more of a gliding movement; it is more dignified; it is not that youthful rush which it used to be. It can be danced by more elderly people. The waltz this year is in the same time as last."

"What is the new waltz every year?"

"The Professor smiled mysteriously and murmured something about 'a tick of the trace' but explained that when he said the modern waltz was slower he was comparing it with the quick waltz of 10 years ago. Nowadays six steps are made in a tick of three."

A definition of the waltz as danced 40 years ago described it as 'a waltz in triple time, and executed by the two persons, who, almost embracing, rapidly turn round on axis of one while moving quickly in a circle whose radius is from 10 to 15 ft., according to the size of the room.'

"Have you, Professor, formed an estimate as to the distance danced by an indefatigable waltzer, who does not sit out one of the 28 waltzes on the programme?"

"It is entirely a matter of calculation. Take our room of 50 ft. in length; you would go round it 12 times in 10 minutes; a waltz lasts—well, it is à la mode—it is a waltz of 15 minutes. Each waltz is a waltz of 15 minutes. A waltz of 15 minutes would give a circuit, say, of 100 ft., or 50 yards, and 12 times round it would mean 1,200 ft., or 1/3 of a mile; and if you went one turn to every yard you progress, and recollect that the circumference of a circle is over three times its diameter, you bring your total distance for one waltz, without rests, to about a mile; so that 18 waltzes would be the equivalent of 18 miles. A vigorous waltzer, however, would do better."

"Now, Professor, what do you say, from your experience, about the limit to an average young lady's dancing exercise?"

"Two hours' continuous dancing, one waltz following the other, as in the programme, would be most injurious. Half the cases of hysteria emanate from over-excitement produced by too much dancing. The girl who leaves no blanks in her programme endangers her health considerably. A young woman in greater physical strength and weight than herself, and yet she is expected to undergo the same amount of fatigue."

"Ought a young lady to go out two nights in succession?"

"Certainly not."

"Ought 'extra' dances to be allowed?"

"They tend enormously to confuse matters. In a properly regulated ball-room 'extras' would not be permitted."

"Then the Professor fell to chatting about the way in which 'square' dances had fallen into disrepute, and how, too, the schottische had lost its popularity. The Minuet de la Cour was not much danced he said, except on special occasions; but the gavotte which is similar but livelier, had sometimes to be arranged."

"The demand for the pas de quatre, or barn dance, is greatly on the increase," added the Professor; "but the pas de quatre of the ball-room is not to be confounded with the dance associated with the Caterpillar Theatre. The ball-room pas de quatre has reference to the number of steps; the stage dance of the same name to the number of dancers."

A young lady, proficient in both dances, obligingly tripped them to demonstrate the difference. Both were charming. The ball-room pas de quatre, which is for two persons, and not for a soloist, reminded one somewhat of the schottische step with a waltz movement introduced towards the end; and the stage pas de quatre had that peculiar kick which every Londoner now sees the street children illustrating at corners where organs men set them dancing."

"The crane for fancy dancing," observes the Professor, "is growing very marked. The introduction of acrobatic feats and the example of Miss Letty Lind set ladies skit-dancing for the entertainment of their friends. They are now taking to the serpentine skit-dancing."

"Do they make anything of it?"

"They will never be good at it. Young ladies who imitate stage dancers forget that the latter have been dancing for years under proficient teachers. If amateurs would only give more time to the beauty and grace of their performance, and less to the acrobatic feats, they would be added to as it is it is woefully impaired by their disregard to little things. They devote their entire attention to their legs, and leave their arms to take care of themselves."

As the Professor talked, a stage dancing master in another room was reduced to despair by the plot-blank declaration on the part of a young lady who was learning a skit dance, whilst a friend was being initiated into an Irish jig. "It is no use to tell me to do this or do that," cried the damsel, "for I can't." The incident drew attention to a point which might have been overlooked. In the methods of teaching dancing to-day all instructions must be eliminated. The pupil expects to be instructed without the trouble to learn the elementary movements, for getting that dancing gives agility and grace, is based upon scientific principles, involving the study of muscular mechanism and the laws of beauty."

The common experience of the novice who decides to take dancing lessons is a feeling of shame that his or her education has been neglected, which is shown in profuse excuses which, as a rule, take this form: "A man will say, 'I have been away in foreign parts' and the young lady will say, 'I was not allowed to learn at school, as my mother did not approve of it.' In these times, however, parents are much more favourable to dancing as a physical recreation, and dancing, it is said, is even to be heard of in convents."

"Dancing," says the Professor, "is becoming more general among all classes. The gentleman is showing a keener desire to learn. Two years ago there was a great difficulty in getting men to dance. We have often had to supply dancing men to people giving balls—perhaps a couple, sometimes eight or ten."

"Are there, then, dancing men to be hired out for the evening?"

"Not exactly hired out. They may be our pupils—gentlemanly fellows, who accept the invitations. People are so busy now that they cannot find time to go to a ball, and we estimate the cost. Then we address the invitations, send them out, and relieve the people of all trouble, even, as I have said, to finding them men to dance, which is not pleasant."

And then the Professor concluded the interview with a story with the moral, "Love is blind."

"There was once," said he, "a devoted husband and wife. The husband believed that the wife could dance divinely, and he came to be taught how to dance, so that he might enjoy the pleasure of the dance with her. The wife also came to practice. I asked my assistant the question, 'Can the lady dance?' and she replied 'Not a bit!'"
